Preamble :

The latest issue of the International Journal of Social Communication presents a diverse collection of scholarly works exploring contemporary media and communication phenomena. With contributions from respected academics across Algeria, Bangladesh, and the UK, this edition delves into significant topics such as digital media's influence on political discourse, deepfakes awareness, online journalism, and the role of social media in shaping youth behavior.

Highlights include a semiological study of "Stranger Things" and Algerian revolutionary cinema, an investigation of African migrant representation in British media, and emerging trends like algorithmic journalism and the metaverse. Additionally, the issue touches upon critical areas like illegal immigration, mental health, and the ethics of media professionals in a rapidly evolving digital landscape.

This issue promises to offer valuable insights for scholars, practitioners, and students interested in media, communication, and the digital transformation of journalism.
